For families of nursing facility residents, being able to remotely monitor their loved ones can bring peace of mind during a difficult period. But for skilled nursing operators, families installing cameras in sensitive areas can open the door to a variety of legal problems — including the violation of federal wiretapping laws.

Only 11 states currently have laws on the books specifically allowing the use of so-called “granny cams” in nursing homes and other long-term care facilities, but according to lawyer Tim Ford, the momentum is in families’ favor.
